Dear ,

Your generous support during the tsunami crisis has already made a difference for children and families across South Asia. On behalf of UNICEF, I'm writing to express my deepest gratitude. I'm especially thankful because I saw your donation dollars at work during a recent 10-day trip to the region.

Despite the terrible human toll of this disaster, I saw hope in the faces of the children I visited, and true heroism in the tireless work of UNICEF's field staff. Small miracles are happening in battered coastal cities and villages throughout the tsunami zone, every hour of every day. And without you, they wouldn't have been possible.

UNICEF colleagues I met in the field repeatedly expressed their sincere thanks for your extraordinary, rapid response to the tsunami crisis.

As of today, we have sent $61 million to save children's lives in South Asia, with more help on the way. And I am proud that 95 cents of every one of those dollars will be used to help kids in desperate need. Here is some information on of what UNICEF is doing:

Child survival: For more than 1 million children who have survived the tsunami disaster, the key is to keep them alive and healthy. UNICEF is providing safe drinking water, building adequate sanitary facilities in displaced persons' camps and schools, distributing basic hygiene kits and educating families on hygiene and sanitation to prevent waterborne infections. UNICEF is organizing immunization campaigns against deadly childhood diseases in the affected countries, and providing doses of vitamin A to boost children's weakened immune systems.

Returning children to school: Over 1,000 schools were damaged or destroyed by the tsunamis, suddenly leaving children without an important, reassuring daily routine. Immediately after the disaster, UNICEF began setting up temporary spaces for children to learn. UNICEF has distributed thousands of "School-in-a-Box" kits containing basic educational materials for use in makeshift classrooms and in schools that have reopened across the region.

UNICEF's field offices have very nearly completed the immediate survival stage of the tsunami disaster response and are now turning to longer-term recovery efforts - thanks in large part to your invaluable assistance.

Thank you for your caring and commitment in this difficult time.

Sincerely,

Charles J. Lyons, President, U.S. Fund for UNICEF
